This research aims to investigate the role or roles of the physical Jerusalem temple within the second temple Jewish writings in terms of whether the physical temple has any role to play in relation to the pivot point in eschatology.

The pivot point or fulcrum in time refers to the end of the exile and perhaps the beginning of the eschaton. The exile may be theological, but many second temple Jewish texts address the physical gathering of the children of Israel to the land of Israel (i.e., from physical exile, even if the text also addresses a theological exile), thus, making the return a complete ingathering of the children of Israel. The passages of these ancient texts have been analysed before, but never with this lens. Looking to see if there is any role the Jerusalem Temple performs in expected eschatological events will at least allow an answer to be given, which is better than never asking the question in the first place, which has been the case until now. This study produces results as the Jerusalem Temple has always been a place of great expectations. Research has revealed the important role that school culture plays on student development in the social, academic, and career readiness domains. Many school districts suffer from problematic school cultures that impede their students' success. This project explores the role that professional school counselors play in promoting positive school through the professional development of teachers, and staff. It additionally explores the historical legislative policies that have impacted school culture, and delves into the implications that a positive school culture has on the teachers, students, and community members of the school district. The professional development generated by the project seeks to improve meaningful staff relationships, through self-exploration and reflection. The hope is that such relationships will improve collaborative efforts, and renew staff commitment to the school district and the students and families it serves.

This study was designed to examine self-directed learning readiness of volunteer community leaders and to determine if and how they used self-directed learning in their community leadership roles. The sample included volunteer community leaders in South Florida serving as board members in community leadership organizations and Rotarians serving in leadership roles in the Rotary District 6990. The mean score for the 131 community leaders who completed the Self-Directed Learning Readiness Scale (Learner Preference Assessment) (Guglielmino, 1978) was 245.09. The mean was significantly higher than the general population mean ($M = 214$, $SD = 25.59$), $t(130) = 18.69$, p
