Medical Practice In Rural Communities According to the National Rural Health Association (NRHA), more than 25 percent of the U.S. population lives in rural areas, yet less than 10 percent of the country's doctors practice there. This could be because of the many obstacles that doctors in a rural setting face, including a lack of access to resources and medical technology, the absence of a defined work schedule and possibly a lower salary than their urban counterparts. Because most rural communities are close-knit, with small populations, doctors get to know their patients, families, and friends more easily. This type of care ensures the trust of a patient and increases the chances of a continuing and successful treatment program.

Top 5 Rural vs. Urban Medical Industry ConcernsThe scope of medical practice in rural areas is frequently more diverse than in urban areas. Rural family physicians, for example, often deliver more infants, have broader hospital privileges, and make house calls. Rural physicians also retain more clinical independence in their practice. On the other hand, some rural physicians may experience professional isolation, with less access to colleagues and medical resources.

Scotland has a population of 5.3 million. The Highlands alone, which takes up 41% of the landmass accounts for the 0.3 million. Providing health services and social care services to the rural communities of Scotland presents challenges but it can be one of the most rewarding and satisfying careers you can have.
